Political science professor talks presidential election

Dr. Caroline Tolbert's presentation Feb. 15 at the Central Park Campus started with a simple question:

Dr. Caroline Tolbert

"Why Iowa?"

The smallish Midwestern state has seven total electoral votes. It is not a battleground state. It is known more for growing corn than most anything else.

That excludes being instrumental in the nomination of presidential candidates.

Dr. Tolbert is a professor of political science at the University of Iowa and spoke at Collin College as part of the Distinguished Speaker Series. She's the author of more than six books and dozens of articles. Her research explores political behavior and elections.

"This is a story as to why you start with Iowa. I'm from Iowa and there's a lot of backlash regarding Iowa starting the nomination process," Dr. Tolbert said.

2008

"On the day of the Iowa caucus, my faith in the American people was vindicated. What you started here in Iowa has swept across the nation. So the people of Iowa I will always be grateful to all of you."

Then-congressman Barack Obama said that in the winter of 2008 after winning the Iowa caucus. This was before "hope" and "change" would define his campaign that would take the presidential election the next November.

By the time of the Iowa caucus, Obama was a virtual nobody. The Democratic frontrunner was congresswoman Hillary Clinton. "She had the most money and the most media attention all across the country. On the Republican side, Mitt Romney had the most money, name recognition and media attention. Erase Iowa and we would have likely seen a Clinton-Romney presidential debate."

Instead, the unlikely happened. Obama took on a grassroots, door-knocking, face-to-face campaign in Iowa. It worked. The underdog jumped up and bit the favorite.

According to Dr. Tolbert's research, Obama spent more time and money into face-to-face campaigning. Romney, who lost Iowa in 2008, spent very little time and money in grassroots campaigning. In 2012, Romney won (or tied Rick Santorum) Iowa. Per the research, he dramatically increased the amount of face-to-face, door-to-door campaigning.

"That's what political science is all about: Finding patterns. Obama is not president by accident. He's president because he used the rules smartly and effectively to win the campaign," Dr. Tolbert said.

The Peanut Farmer

Obama's improbable springboard to prominence during and after the Iowa caucus was not the first time a Democratic candidate found himself from going from unknown to the White House.

It was 1976 and the little-known governor of Georgia Jimmy Carter was running for the Democratic presidential nomination. Iowa would propel Carter into the national spotlight providing him the momentum for a run for the Oval Office. It also propelled the Iowa caucus into what it is today: The marquee primary and what Dr. Tolbert thinks is a good indicator of who runs for president.

Carter won Iowa in 1976 getting 28 percent of the caucus votes. The nearest competitor – Birch Bayh – received 13 percent. Carter would win 13 of the first 14 primaries and caucuses, including Texas, Florida, Pennsylvania and Illinois.

"The way the system is set up, winning Iowa can be important in picking a president," Dr. Tolbert said. She added that "winning" Iowa might not always result in more delegate votes. Candidates like Santorum have benefited with outperforming preconceived media expectations.

"You don't have to win Iowa. You have to do better than what the media expects you to do," she said. "Santorum was not predicted to be one of the frontrunners to win or tie the Iowa caucus. Obviously Obama did this in 2008."

By outperforming media expectations in Iowa, and maybe winning outright, candidates build momentum, donors are more likely to, for lack of a better word, "buy" in and the media begins to cover them more in upcoming primaries.

Case in point: Mitt Romney, a Republican nominee candidate in 2008. After failing in Iowa, he lost momentum, money and media attention. Thus, he lost the confidence of the other Republican voters in other states, according to Dr. Tolbert.

"He might have been a good president. But he sent signals in Iowa and New Hampshire that he can't win the nomination and that he would not be able to beat Obama," she said.

In reality, Iowa is not the only important early primary. Dr. Tolbert points to New Hampshire and South Carolina as being very vital, which makes the current Republican nomination process interesting because Santorum and Romney effectively "won" Iowa, Romney won New Hampshire and Newt Gingrich won South Carolina. Essentially, the nomination will boil down to Super Tuesday on March 6 when 10 states will hold their respective primaries and caucuses.

In polls administered by Dr. Tolbert and her partners, 50 percent of voters knew that Obama had won the Iowa caucus in 2008. By Super Tuesday, 55 percent knew.

“If you knew Obama had won Iowa, you were more likely to think he was going to win the party’s nomination,” Dr. Tolbert said. “If you believed a candidate was electable, you were much more likely to vote for that candidate. People are strategic and don’t want to throw away their vote. The bottom line is knowing that Obama won Iowa made people believe that he was viable and increased the probability of them voting for Obama.”

The Caucus

Whereas a primary resembles a general election – people go to a polling location and privately cast a vote – the caucus is different.

A caucus is a meeting of local party business – officers are elected and operations are discussed. Then, an individual will stand up and give a summary of a nominee candidate. In Iowa, the Democratic caucus is a public vote. People will stand up and go to a corner of the room as a “vote” for a nominee. On the Republican side, it’s a private vote. There are two rounds of voting and a candidate must get 15 percent of the vote to remain in the race. If a candidate doesn’t get 15 percent, those voters must choose another candidate in the next round.

More than 50 percent of eligible voters participate in the New Hampshire primary. About six percent of eligible voters turn out for the Iowa caucus. This is why grassroots tactics like knocking on doors works in Iowa.

“The whole name of the game is mobilizing voters to turn out,” Dr. Tolbert said. “Grassroots is how you get people out on a cold January night caucusing rather than just casting a ballot. It tests these candidates. If it’s just an election, you can throw money at the problem. And if you have money you can just run ads attacking each other. You can’t buy a turnout in a caucus. You have to have grassroots politics and volunteers.”

Fairness

Criticism of the current nomination process points to the perceived unfairness of Iowa – a small state – starting the process (or any one state starting the process). This is amplified by the small turnout in the caucus holding such a giant impact.

Options include a national primary in which every state votes on the same day, which would eradicate the weeding-out process currently in place with states going in a sequential order.

Other options include a regional primaries or a graduated primary system where the small states would vote, then the medium-sized states, then medium-large states then the large states. In this situation, the small states voting first would not have the delegates for someone to clinch a nomination and it would keep the “weeding-out” element in play.

“Lots of people don’t like this system. Every year there’s so much grumbling. Why don’t we change? Because the parties can’t agree on anything else. They’re stuck,” Dr. Tolbert said.

Music professor passes away

Collin College is mourning the loss of groundbreaking professor Sabine Madriguera.

Madriguera, 42, passed away Feb. 22 after a two-year battle with cancer. She was the director of guitar studies at Collin College, where she started in the fall of 1999. The flags at all Collin College campuses were lowered to half-staff in her honor.

"Sabine's passing is a great loss to Collin College," said Cary Israel, district president. "She exemplified the caring, hard-working and scholarly standard that we hold true at Collin College for our professors. Her impact on the lives of her students, colleagues and anyone who heard her music is immeasurable."

Sabine Madriguera

Madriguera's student ensembles at Collin College were highly competitive and even earned top honors at The University of Texas at Brownsville Guitar Ensemble Festival and Competition.

Professor Madriguera held a master's degree in guitar performance and pedagogy from Hochschule fuer Musik "Hanns Eisler" in Berlin, Germany, and she was a member of the advisory board to the Allegro Guitar Society. In 2005 she became the first director of the Guitar Orchestra for Cross Timbers Youth Orchestra. Madriguera had previously taught at The University of Texas at Dallas, Brookhaven College and the Music School Treptow in Berlin, Germany.

Madriguera's husband, Enric, also teaches guitar at Collin College.

In 1996, Sabine and Enric formed Duo Madriguera and were featured at international festivals in Austria, the Czech Republic, Mexico, Peru and Spain. Duo Madriguera has performed in prestigious halls like the Sala Manuel Ponce in Mexico City and the Teatro Villa de Madrid, for the Sociedad Espanola, which is the guitar society of Madrid. In 2009, Sabine and Enric embarked on a four-city tour of Peru co-sponsored by Partners of the Americas and the U.S. Embassy.

Cisco College 66, Lady Cougars 59

Janell Beacham and Zbeyda Aremi scored 13 points apiece and Sam Offord had 12 points, nine boards and five assists in the loss.

Lady Cougars 66, Southwestern Christian College 50

McClennan College 49, Lady Cougars 46

Lady Cougars 53, Temple College 47

Men Hit 20 Wins, Narrowly Miss Playoffs

Four the fifth straight year under head coach Jim Sigona, the men's basketball team has reached 20 wins in a season. In fact, they've reached 20 wins 10 times and 19 wins four other times.

Unfortunately, the Cougars missed the post-season finishing fourth in their conference with a 7-7 conference record, tied with Weatherford and Temple colleges.

As a tie-breaker, the three teams' power rankings - judging their records against the best teams -- were compared and Collin College fell short.

Ranger College 78, Collin College 72

Andre Corley led the men with 18 points and Amos Wilson chipped in 16 in the conference loss. The Cougars hit 10 three-pointers; however, 17 turnovers hurt them against the the conference leader.

Transfer Programs

Are you planning to transfer in the fall?

Did you know you can make that transition much easier with the work ethic and participation skills you develop right here at Collin College.

Some suggestions:

- Make sure you know how you are doing in class. Ask questions early and often. Don't wait until it is too late to get back on track. Do you know where to look for assistance? If not, ask classmates, your professor, or an academic advisor.
- Do you have a study group going? They can be a great way to work through problems, discuss difficult material, and study for exams. Talk to people around you in class or send email through your class Blackboard account. Some groups meet in a coffee shop while others prefer the library or other campus location. If you are an introvert, consider a study partner instead of a group. There are many on-line resources. Here is a site that is well organized, but another may be more useful for you: How To Study.org.
- Get connected on campus! Challenge yourself to attend at least one event per semester on campus. There are a wide variety of opportunities for seminars, visiting lecturers, performances, and other events. Use the Collin calendar link below to find these.

For more information about transferring, contact the Transfer Programs Office at 972.985.3734 or visit <http://transferu.collin.edu>.
